ONE-HORSE TOWN

Condensed from the story* by BETH BROWN
Author of "Hotel for Dogs," and other stories and records

"What's a horse?" asked all the people in New York City when Butter Ball arrived in town. But the bronze horse and general knew right away

ONCE upon a time, a hundred years from now, there was a little horse called Butter Ball.

He was chubby and brown, with a tail a yard long, and bangs in front cut in the latest fashion. He lived in a big green pasture. Every day Butter Ball ran to the edge of the meadow to watch the train to New York City go by.

One day Butter Ball had a wonderful idea! "I'm going to get on the next train to New York," he told himself, and ran all the way home. He packed his toothbrush and pajamas in a black suitcase.

When the night became as dark as chocolate layer cake, he ran to the railroad station and waited for the train.

It was a long, long ride, but he finally got there. "So this is New York," exclaimed Butter Ball, looking around the station at all the people in the crowd.

Everybody stared at him. "I wonder what it is," everybody asked everybody else. All at once, an old, old man with a white beard and two pairs of glasses on his nose came over. He looked at Butter Ball out of both pairs of glasses at the same time, and then he said, "Why, that's a horse!"

"We've never seen a horse except in picture books!" everybody answered.

Butter Ball thought this was very strange. But when he walked out into the street, sure enough — there were no horses! Only automobiles and airplanes and people riding on winged roller skates!

Someone sent for a Blue Policeman on skates, and the Blue Policeman sent someone else to get the Mayor. The Mayor took one amazed look at Butter Ball. "Who in the world are you?"

"I'm Butter Ball!" Butter Ball informed him politely. "I came to New York on the train. I'd like to see the city."

* The complete story can be heard on DeLuxe records.

"I'll be pleased to take you to lunch and show you the city," said the Mayor. "Please come this way."

The Mayor ordered soup, meat and potatoes, deep-dish peach pie and milk for two. But Butter Ball called the waiter back. "May I please have oats?"

"Why certainly, sir," said the waiter and yelled, "OATS!"

The kitchen door opened, the cook stuck out his head and yelled, "NO OATS!"

"We have no oats!" repeated the waiter.

"Thank you," said Butter Ball, sitting quietly, while the Mayor ate and ate.

"This is a great town," the Mayor told Butter Ball. "Have you ever seen the zoo?"

"No," answered Butter Ball, "but I'd like to go."

The Mayor was delighted because he meant to take Butter Ball to the zoo and leave him there!

Right after lunch they went to the zoo in a taxicab. The Mayor whispered something to the head zoo keeper and the head zoo keeper whispered back. Butter Ball soon learned what they were whispering about, for he found himself behind a tall iron fence.

Children came and peeped through the bars. Grownups came and stared. The head keeper brought plenty of oats, but Butter Ball was unhappy. He wanted to get out.

That night, when all the animals were fast asleep, he packed up his toothbrush and pajamas. Then he jumped over the high iron fence into the street.

He ran and ran till he came to a horse standing in the middle of a road. The horse was made of bronze although Butter Ball didn't know it. A bronze general was sitting on him.

"Hello!" said Butter Ball, but the bronze horse didn't answer.

So Butter Ball sat down and looked up at the sky until one minute to midnight.

He was just about to leave when the bronze horse began to speak. "Bronze horses can't talk until midnight, and bronze men never get off bronze horses till it's one minute past midnight."

"Is that so?" asked Butter Ball.

"Where did you come from?" asked the bronze horse. "I haven't seen a real horse for over fifty years. There are none left in the city."

"Then I've made this a one-horse town!" laughed Butter Ball. "Imagine making a one-horse town out of New York City!"

At one minute past midnight, the bronze general climbed off the bronze horse and stretched his arms and legs.

"But, really," Butter Ball continued, "I don't want to remain in New York City. I'd like to go home."

"We'll help you," said the bronze general as he reached into his back pocket for a three-yard-long timetable. He kept one yard of it for himself, and handed one yard to Butter Ball and the other yard to the bronze horse. The bronze horse found the right train. "There's one at two o'clock."

The general consulted his pocket watch. "You have plenty of time to catch that train at Grand Central Station."

"I don't know how to get to Grand Central Station," replied Butter Ball.

"We will take you," said the general. "I'll ride you to the station."

The general and Butter Ball and the bronze horse galloped along Broadway. When they came to Grand Central, the general bought Butter Ball's ticket.

They waited in the waiting room till train time. Then they all shook hands and went to the gate.

"ALL ABOARD!" cried the conductor.

Butter Ball and the bronze horse and the bronze general all shook hands again and said goodbye. Then Butter Ball went into the train and the train left.

That's the last time anybody in New York City ever saw a real horse—once upon a time, a hundred years from now.

- ★ share adventures with great heroes!

YOU CAN DO IT! You can be carried away through strange lands you never dreamed of . . . you can be thrilled and delighted as never before. You can experience all the wonders of an amazing excursion when you read the greatest stories of all time, written by the world's most gifted authors, and brought together for you in

SIX BIG VOLUMES of The WHAT-EVERY-CHILD-SHOULD-KNOW Library

CHAMPIONS OF FREEDOM

Sixty-seven immortal stories of great men and women who changed the thinking, living and pursuit of happiness for all mankind from Moses and Socrates to Isaac Newton, William Penn, Helen Keller, Abraham Lincoln. Men of action of every nation appear in this procession of Champions of Freedom.

DOG STORIES

In this book, Albert Payson Terhune, the foremost writer of dog stories in the world tells eighty-five heart-warming stories. Here are the dogs of kings and beggars, dogs who were actors and dogs who were heroes, dogs who saved lives and dogs who died in devotion to their masters or their duty.

NATURAL WONDERS

This wonderful book will tell you about the beginning of life, how we grow and about the many other remarkable phenomena of science and nature. On subjects ranging from ants to elephants, the author Edwin Tenney Brewster, will bring you a wealth of useful, interesting information.

FAMOUS STORIES

In this volume there have been collected the most enchanting of those familiar much-loved stories — not fairy stories nor quite true ones, but they could have happened! They are stories free and joyful, written by such well-known authors as Charles Dickens, John Ruskin and William Austin.

BIBLE STORIES

You will treasure this wonderful book as long as you live. No one needs to tell you of the beauty of the Scriptures, how simply its enchanting stories are told. You will be so much wiser and gain a greater understanding of the world and the people around you for having read them.

FOLK TALES

Long ago before there were any books to read, gifted story-tellers would go from house to house and recite their heart-warming tales. These same stories, passed along from generation to generation, are collected for you in this book. They are folk tales and legends of many lands.

HERE'S HOW YOU CAN SEE AND OWN THIS WONDERFUL LIBRARY

Show this ad to Mother and Dad. They will be just as enthusiastic about it as thousands of other parents who have bought previously published volumes of The WHAT-EVERY-CHILD-SHOULD-KNOW Library for their children.
